

Incorporating Instructional Rounds into Your School and/or District

Results happen when schools increase dialogue and reflection around instructional practice.

February 21, 2017 – 8:30 a.m. to 3:30 p.m.

Presenter: Cathy Clarksen, Ph.D., Dynamic Learning Collaborative Coordinator

Description

Learn how to use instructional rounds to build a mindset of collective responsibility for the learning of all students. In the medical field doctors participate in rounds to teach and learn from one another. Instructional rounds provide the same experience for teachers. The primary purpose is for observing teachers to compare their own instructional practices with those of the teachers they observe. Instructional rounds end with observing teachers identifying instructional practices they'll continue to use because they saw other teachers employing them effectively, practices they currently use that they will now reexamine in light of what they observed, and practices they don't currently use but will try because they saw other teachers use them well.

Instructional rounds are one of the most valuable tools that a school or district can use to enhance teachers' pedagogical skills and develop a culture of collaboration. - Robert Marzano.

Workshop Objectives

- Learn strategies and protocols focused on the organization and the discussion that takes place among observing teachers at the end of the observation as well as in subsequent self-reflection.
- View an instructional rounds debriefing session.
- Hear from a team who use instructional rounds to raise instructional expectations.
