

Writing Supports for Students with Learning Disabilities in Middle/High School

November 22, 2011

This session will look at the two aspects of writing, the motor component and the composing component. Often students are able to tell verbally what they want to write, yet their written work is much less detailed and can be difficult to read while other students have difficulty composing or organizing what they want to write. Exploring assistive technology tools from pencil grips to complex computer programs, and using the writing continuum will help the participant understand the depth and breadth of tools that can support these students.

Participants will have hands on with low to high tech AT supports as well as web based supports that can be used with their students. Students who would like to learn more about AT writing tools that they may benefit from are encouraged to attend and also have a special fee schedule.
